ACTS X. 38.

“WHO WENT ABOUT DOING GOOD.”

THE life and example of the blessed Jesus are set before us, not that we should barely admire his purity and applaud his holiness, but that we should endeavour to imitate his perfections and be conformed to his likeness. And if we contemplate the divine nature, we shall soon perceive that love is the most eminent quality therein, that it is the noblest star in the heavenly constellation of virtues, being most bright in its lustre, most mild in its influence, most extensive in its circuit, and most beneficial in its consequences. The inspired writers, when they speak of God, speak of him as a being holy, just, and powerful; but when the beloved disciple speaks of the Deity he is not content to say God is gracious and lovely, but uses the abstract word, and says, God is Love, as if love, if I may use the expression, was the compounding principle of the divinity and the very essence of the godhead. And agreeably to this principle, thanks to his mercy for the same, every institution of providence seems to be framed; every act of the life of Christ was directed to works of benevolence, nay every effort even of his divinity was exerted in performing them. To this we owe existence itself, and all the comforts and convenience of our present state. To this are owing the hopes we entertain of future happiness, and the expectation of eternal glory. For as the goodness of God suggested the idea of making man in his own image in order to extend felicity; so the love of Christ planned the gracious method of redemption to restore the happiness which the folly or perverseness of our first parents had forfeited by their transgression.

While he continued on earth the blessed Jesus employed his whole time and thoughts in supplying the necessities, instructing the ignorance, healing the diseases, and forgiving the sins of those he condescended to call his brethren. He sought occasions and solicited opportunities of doing service to mankind, in a manner most essentially useful to them; for, as the text assures us, He went about doing good while he abode on earth, and after he was taken hence by an ignominious death he doth not leave us comfortless, he doth not forsake our cause, but supports us with his divine grace, assists us by the influence of his Holy Spirit, pleads the merits of his precious blood-shedding to reconcile us to his Father, secures our pardon by his cross and passion, and by his death opens to us the gate of everlasting life. Here then are inestimable blessings purchased for us by the meritorious sufferings of the Son of God, who went about doing good, and now he is ascended into heaven exercises his mediatorial power in intercessions for our pardon at the right hand of God. From this compleat pattern of goodness, from this source of divine love, we may recollect the extent of that duty which is the bond of peace and all perfectness, and the method of exercising that love which is the fulfilling of the law of God.
8 intercessions

I shall beg leave to observe, that Christian love or charity is universal in regard to its extent, most comprehensive in respect of its object, active in seeking occasions of doing good, and happy in finding them, because the exercise of this virtue is most honourable, and its rewards most glorious.

Like the sun, benevolence is not stationary, but goeth forth beholding the evil and the good, the one indeed with the eye of approbation and regard, the other with the look of pity and compassion. It rejoices to run its course that it may nourish with its rays, enliven with its beams, and support with its kindly influence every object within its sphere. And we may observe that the word humanity is most properly expressive of the nature of man, and also of that quality which is the peculiar ornament and dignity of his nature. It does not wait for applications, but eagerly seeks for occasions of exerting itself; it does not require petitions to incline it to act, but the good man anticipates the wishes of those around him by voluntary offers of his services. For munificence is dispensed with the most refined tenderness, and real bounty is conferred with as much address as the artful employ in soliciting it.

For

For the courteous manner of giving prevents, as far as possible, the blush of acceptance, and endeavours to exclude every return from the receiver except gratitude; and that the benevolent man wishes to be rendered to the Author of his being and the Giver of every good and perfect gift. And so congenial to the soul of man is benevolence, that even in fiction a sentiment of humanity was once received in the theatre of Rome with such repeated and universal applause, that did equal honour to the taste of the author, and the sensibility of the polite audience, for it manifested that they thought whatever was expressive of humanity was worthy the notice and approbation of men.

The principle of charity also is constantly shown in being just to the merits, conniving at the foibles, overlooking the infirmities, and alleviating the crimes of our fellow-creatures; in forgiving the actual injuries offered to ourselves, and alledging causes for the wrong behaviour of others, when reason will permit us to do so; and when it will not, calling in the assistance of candor to conceal, or charity to pardon their misconduct. For true charity suffereth long and is kind to the authors of its suffering, and endureth all things with Christian patience and manly perseverance. And where material services cannot be performed, the benevolent person will give a cup of cold water to a disciple in the name of a disciple, and what he is able to bestow he will give with every mark of courtesy, politeness and civility, by which method charity is refined by a more pleasing manner of performing its acts, or a more elegant mode of expressing itself on those occasions. Thus also it is complying with the inclinations, yielding to the dispositions of others in matters of an indifferent nature, and falling in with the innocent foibles and amusements of those about us, which, though the good sense of the man cannot relish or approve, yet his good-nature may induce him to partake of.

But above all, benevolence calls on us to relieve the necessities of the indigent, and administer to the wants of the poor; to cheer the heart of the fatherless, and to wipe the tear from the widow in her distress. For compassion will attend to the particular circumstances and degrees of calamity, and adapt itself to every mode by which sorrow may be relieved, and affliction allayed, and will count it all joy to distribute, and the highest delight to communicate, being not only universal in benevolence and active in the works of it, but also constant and unwearied in its exertions in the labour of love. For love, founded on a Christian principle, will not continue in a torpid state or a dormant situation, but will, when they do not occur, look out for objects, and seek where it is not sought. The charitable man considers that angels and beings of a superior order and excellence are most constant in fulfilling the offices of love, and celebrating the praises of their God. These are ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who are heirs of salvation, and cease not day and night singing their Hallelujahs before the throne of grace, thus joining together what ought never to be put asunder—acts of piety and deeds of charity. We may recollect also, that the most perfect of all Beings is infinitely the most active in promoting our welfare, for he created all things by his power, supports them by his continual mercy, and filleth all things living with the plenteousness of his goodness. In a word, charity is that golden chain which is let down from above, and joins men together in one union and fellowship, which connects earth with heaven, men with angels, and both with God. Few people are so inhuman but they will, at times, feel for the distresses of their brethren; and few so hardened, but will find some gleams of affection break in on their souls, and short intermitting fits of benevolence steal on their breasts. Nature will oblige us to pay the tribute of a tear to calamity, and join in the sympathetic sigh of woe. A tyrant of antiquity once wept when a tragedy was presented in his presence, but no sooner was the object of distress removed away than the temporary compassion ceased in his breast, and the former severity of his disposition returned. And though David, at the instigation of a base passion, was prompted to dishonor the wife of his friend, and afterwards to take away the life also of that friend; yet his humanity and justice were roused, and obliged him to pronounce a righteous sentence on himself, when his crimes were laid before him by the parabolical representation of the prophet. But men of a charitable disposition do not require external objects to awaken them to a sense of their duty, or lively representations to stir their willing minds. Benevolent affections, therefore, do not, by sudden gusts, break forth into prodigality, or overflow without refreshing the country, but they they move on in a calm even direction, fertilizing the fields by the constancy of their current, and enlivening the prospect by the regularity and beauty of their course.

But farther. The exercise of Christian love is the most honorable of all employments which can engage our attention in our present state. For it is not only the foundation of all virtue, but also of all the liberal arts and sciences. For an ingenious * traveller has lately told us, that the altar of love is placed at the entrance of the academy of Athens, by which it was probably intimated, that no one was worthy to pass the gate of knowledge, or was capable of relishing the elegant arts, who was not possessed of a generous soul, actuated by all the kindly affections of love. Nay, such was their respect for benevolence, that the Heathens, on the principle of gratitude, erected temples and dedicated altars to the benefactors of mankind, and enrolled them in the number of their deities. And when Barnabas and Paul restored a cripple to the use of his limbs, the Lycaonians were ready to acknowledge and adore them as gods. And it was on his feeding the multitude that the disciples pronounced JESUS to be the Son of God.

We should remember likewise, that by doing acts of charity we are admitted to the glorious character of being fellow-workers with Christ himself.

* Dr. Chandler's Travels into Greece, p. 108.

And these acts are not only honorable in themselves, but most pleasant also to those who engage in performing them. It is more blessed to give than to receive, was a favourite expression of our divine Master, and it is doubtless a great felicity to have it in our power to do good, but it is a greater still to have an inclination to do it. For we cannot relieve the miserable, support the weak, or cause the heart of the widow to sing for joy, without partaking of the comfort we bestow. Nay it is redoubled to us by coming back again by rebound from others, and also by direct and immediate sensation. "For
 " to administer relief to the sufferings of our fellow" creatures, is in some degree to comply with the cravings
 " of nature in ourselves, and to provide for our own ease " and enjoyment. For the pity and compassion which " miserable objects raise in us are attended with a pain
 " and uneasiness to ourselves, no otherwise to be allayed
 " but by relieving the misery which caused them *." For the body politic, as well as the body natural, being by joints and bands knit together, increaseth with the increase of God, so that if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it, and if one member rejoiceth, the other participate in its joy.

I will here beg leave to call your attention to the distressed situation of the families of our deceased brethren of the clergy, who were, while among us, diligent in recommending the deeds of charity, and active in the performance of them. And can any earthly sorrow be equal to the sorrow of those who are deprived, and perhaps by a sudden stroke of death, are deprived in a moment of an husband and a parent; and in him of every thing most valuable, every thing which interest and affection holds most dear. The prosperity they have lately experienced serves only on the recollection of it to increase present anguish, and by a painful comparison of the past and the present, aggravate their distress and augment their woe. They are cut off, perhaps, from a state of affluence, at least from one of comfortable subsistence, and are driven from the house whence abundance was wont to flow, or at least where competency and content did usually reside; from this situation they are fallen, fallen never to rise, perhaps never to hope again, except from the bounty of this assembly, and the charitable disposition of those who compose it. The sphere of life in which they have moved, the tenderness of their education, the indulgence which their station allowed or required, all conspire to heighten the affliction of the fatherless and widow, and the more they have been taught to feel for the calamities of others, the more they will certainly feel for their own. For an ingenuous mind must be sorely afflicted when it changes ease for toil, affluence for poverty, competency for contempt; and it may perhaps be more sensible of the scorings of the wealthy, and the despitifulness of the proud, than of real injuries and misfortunes. But as there is no occasion to stir up your remembrance of such distress, or your charitable disposition to relieve it, I will only implore the goodness of the Almighty to avert this this and every other calamity from the persons and families of those who compose this assembly; beseeching him that they may know nothing more of the poignancy of such sorrow, except what they learn from this very imperfect description thereof.

But in order to give a continuance and permanency to the things we possess, and to bring down an additional blessing on them, let us use them in the method which God has appointed, and apply them to the purposes for which they were ordained by providence. And to encourage us in this labour of love, let us with gratitude acknowledge the assistance we receive therein from many of the most eminent characters of the laity in this kingdom, who by their fortunes, countenance and assiduity, have continually ministered to the necessities of the clergy, and still do minister.

And above all, let us express our gratitude to our gracious Sovereign on this occasion, who has given a noble instance of his goodness to us by the additional support he has granted to this institution. And I doubt not but that we, in return for these benefits, shall be inclined always to express our acknowledgments for them, and show our gratitude to him by a constant obedience of his laws, and by continual prayers to the throne of grace, that his reign may be long and prosperous on earth, and that when, late may it be! he puts off his earthly diadem, he may receive a crown of glory, the reward of those who serve and obey their God.

Animated

Animated by such examples, and still more by the promises of Christ, let us bestow a large share of our substance on the objects of this day's charity, not grudgingly, not sparingly, but with a liberal hand, and in a manner which our utmost abilities will enable us, and our enlarged affections and willing minds may prompt us, and the situation of the petitioners may require at our hands. By these methods we shall lay up a good foundation for the time to come, we shall assimilate our nature to that of God, and draw near to our blessed Redeemer himself. And we may be assured, that the works of charity which are founded in faith, and are done with sincerity, will ensure success to our honest endeavours, and happiness to the whole of our lives; and what is more, will wonderfully support us in the awful hour of death, and effectually plead for us in the important day of judgment.

Answered to each example, and likewise in the proportion of the law, let us follow a path of holiness, not in the sight of men, but in the sight of God, not in the hope of reward, but in the love of God, and in the power of his Spirit, who will enable us to overcome all our sins, and to keep his commandments, and to abide in him, and he will give us the fruit of his Spirit, which is love, joy, peace, and the like.
 And thus we shall have the witness within us, that we are the children of God, and that we shall inherit the kingdom of glory, which is the life everlasting.
 And we may be assured, that the words of the Holy Spirit, which are written in the Scriptures, will be fulfilled in us, and that we shall be able to overcome all our sins, and to keep his commandments, and to abide in him, and he will give us the fruit of his Spirit, which is love, joy, peace, and the

THE Secretary having, in an Appendix to the Sermon which was preached by Dr. WARREN, (now Bishop of Bangor) at the Anniversary Meeting of the Sons of the Clergy in 1778, published as exact Lists of the Stewards and Preachers as he could then procure; and finding that his Design was approved of, he has endeavoured to render it more perfect; and is happy to think that he is now enabled, by the kind Communications of his Friends, to lay before the Public very exact Lists of the Nobility, Clergy, and Gentry, who have been Stewards for the Feast of the Sons of the Clergy, together with the Names of the Preachers *, and the Sums collected at the Anniversary Meetings since the Year 1721.

* The first Preacher on this Occasion was the Rev. George Hall, M. A. Pastor of St. Botolph, Aldersgate, and afterwards Bishop of Chester. This Sermon was preached at St. Paul's, November the 18th, 1655, from Numbers xvii. 8.

The second Sermon was preached by the Rev. Thomas Manton, D. D. from Psalm cii. 28. This Sermon is in the 3d Vol. of Dr. Manton's Works, p. 116.

Dr. Godolphin, Dean of St. Paul's, had refused letting Music be introduced into the Church when Queen Anne went in State to that Cathedral, to a public Thanksgiving, for some of the Duke of Marlborough's Victories; the Year after that Refusal, Dr. Tenison, Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Keeper Wright, the then Lord Mayor of London, (all Clergymens Sons), John Forster, Esq; and others, Stewards, being desirous of having Music, in order to increase the Collection, applied to the Dean, who said he could not consent, as he had refused the Queen the Year before. Upon which the Archbishop, the Lord Keeper, and the Lord Mayor were appointed a Committee to wait on the Queen for her Consent, if the Dean's could be obtained, who graciously answered, She should be very glad if it could be, as she thought it would be a great Means of drawing Company, and increasing the Fund, to which she earnestly wished Success; and perhaps the Dean might be prevailed upon to be more obliging to promote a Charity for his own Cloth than he had been to her. Accordingly the Dean did give Leave, and it is said, that either Dr. Purcell, or Dr. Blow, conducted the Music, and that the Rev. Mr. Atterbury, Lecturer of St. Bride's, preached the Sermon.
